

Stenner Wealth Partners+

Read What We're Reading

Suggested Reading

Entrepreneurship, labour market, crude exports, and other trends to watch this year. To help make sense of 2025, The Globe and Mail asked dozens of experts, including economists, investors, academics and business leaders, to each choose a chart they think will be important to watch.

“Today, U.S. shipments account for more than half of Canada’s imports, replacing what were, historically, barrels from the Middle East and West Africa. But a far larger volume of crude oil flows south; Canada has been the largest source of U.S. crude imports for more than two decades. Over time, Canada has steadily, and then rapidly, consolidated that position, now accounting for more than half of total U.S. foreign crude purchases, or nearly four million barrels per day.

This symbiotic relationship grew out of decades of trust and mutual self-interest. President-elect Donald Trump’s threatened tariff on all Canadian goods, including oil, violate that cross-border trust and risk economic harm to Canadian crude producers, as well as U.S. refineries and consumers.”

To read more please click here.